

In This Issue:

- 1: View from the Dome
- 2: Utilizing Light and Color
- 3: Operation of the Kelly Personal Ag Analyzer
- 6: Meridians: The Eastern Paths to Energy Balance
- 8: Wheel of the Meridians
- 9: Body Meridians Chart
- 10: Meridian Index Analysis
- 11: 2008 Planting Calendar
- 12: 2008 Calendar of Indications
- 12: 72 Hour Kit for Emergency Preparedness

View from the Dome

Hello Friends!

We open this issue with several exciting new products that will make it easy for any researcher to introduce light and color into his or her research. The body of knowledge associated with light and color is immense, and dates back to the time of the ancients. Our new color gel and glass reagent sets make insertion of any of these principles into a radionic broadcast as easy as putting a test tube in the sample well.

The next article was literally written by popular demand – a recap of the core fundamentals of operation of a Kelly Personal Analyzer. While this was really requested by some of our newer customers, I hope that some new insights will be revealed to even the old pros among you.

The centerpiece of this issue is an overview of the ancient system of knowledge based on the Wheel of Meridians, which is a graphical representation of the body's naturally-occurring network of life energy pathways. Practical strategies and techniques for exploring and/or utilizing this knowledge are presented, with radionic information provided for those researchers who wish to extrapolate the information into the world of agriculture.

The ebb and flow of life energy also lies at the heart of those perennial reader favorites, the Planting Calendar and the Calendar of Indications. The old timers depended on the knowledge of the Earth's subtle rhythms to help guide their scheduling, to carry out their tasks at the times when the great tides of energy are working for them rather than against them.

Finally, we close with a checklist of tools and supplies that you would want to have on hand in the event that you suddenly found yourself cut free from life's modern conveniences for a 72 hour period. We are not talking about doomsday scenarios, just the completely plausible loss of utilities that may come from a weather event or a hiccup in the infrastructure.

Just last night the power went out at our house at 6:00 p.m. for no reason we could ever determine. There was still a little sunlight left at that hour, so it was no problem to light a few of the candles and oil lamps we have around the house, then light a fire in the wood stove for heat.

My wife and I were playing a game of Scrabble by the light of a battery lantern when the power came back on at a little before 9 o'clock and "normal" life resumed.

Thanks to a few common sense precautions we had taken in the past, this little power outage was nothing but a cozy excuse for my wife and me to spend some time together in front of a fire. And thanks to an inexpensive propane camp stove and a decently stocked pantry of canned and dry goods, we also would have been fine if the outage had extended on for a few days or more.

How would each of you fare if your power was turned off for a few hours some night? How about a few days or a week?

I urge each of you to take stock of your situation, think through the implications of a loss of utility service in your home or area, either power, gas or water. Would your home be habitable if you lost power as a result of winter storm, or could your family face a subzero nightmare due to a lack of alternative heating options? Are there conditions unique to your area such that you might reasonably expect that you will be forced to evacuate due to a hurricane, a major flood or a wildfire some day? Would you be forced to flee with the few things you could throw together in a few minutes, or would you have all the essentials your family might need bagged up and ready to go?

The changing climate is going to bring stronger and more violent storms, which will lead to more of the interruptions in the services that we have come to take for granted. Basic preparedness is easy to do and can be done inexpensively over time. Take control of your own destiny—~~be~~ prepared!

Happiness is a full woodpile!

